War on the Shore celebrates 10th anniversary

MICHAEL WOJTYCHIV
mwojtychiv@22ndcenturymedia.com

Last year, at this very same time of the year and in this very same editorial space, I did arguably one of the scariest things I've done and told all of you about growing up with epilepsy.

First, I'd like to thank all of you who reached out about the piece and your kind words, they were really appreciated because, to be honest, I was really worried about what people might say or treat me differently once they knew.

But none of that happened, so thank you very much again.

This past weekend marked the 10th annual War on the Shore shootout, a basketball shootout featuring the boys basketball teams from Evanston, Loyola and New Trier (Page 36) against schools from all across Chicagoland.

Coincidentally, this year was more of a North Shore vs. South Suburbs event, as the three teams that traveled to play in the War on the Shore were Oak Lawn, Homewood-Flossmoor and Hillcrest.

The appearance in the shootout was the first for both Hillcrest and Oak Lawn and it was great to see such a large number of fans from all the schools come out to support the Danny Did Foundation and its fight against epilepsy.

In my time here at 22nd Century Media — and as a member of the Danny Did Foundation's Young Professionals Board — I've seen around 10 different teams from the area come in to play in the one-day event. And it's been some big names as well, like all three schools this year and schools like Bolingbrook, St. Viator, Benet, Geneva and Jacobs, among multiple others come out to play.

"Being the charity partner to War on the Shore for the past 10 years has allowed us to reach 17 different school communities with Danny's story and information about epilepsy and seizures," said Mike Stanton, Danny's dad and co-founder of the Danny Did Foundation. "Every year, as the teams compete and young fans run around in the bleachers, we really feel Danny's presence. We know this is an event he would love."

All three games were exceptional this year, with the Loyola and Evanston games coming down to the wire. Next year's slate isn't determined yet, but will be at Loyola in 2021, so be sure to keep an eye out. If the matchups are anything like the ones we just saw, we're in store for another great weekend of hoops.

LETTER

Board's purpose in creating a Tax Increment Financing District is to revitalize a business district that has been moribund and declining for decades. The Board has never said that Kenilworth's business corridor was "blighted." That is a term used by opponents of the TIF District but there is no denying that certain sections of it have been declining for decades.

The Board believes that a revitalized business district would result in lessening the tax burden residential property owners in Kenilworth now bear. (Currently, Kenilworth's business district represents only 4% to the Total As-essed Value of our Village, leaving residential property owners to carry 96% of the load.) An additional benefit of a revitalized business district would be the creation of local amenities that are needed to attract new families to our community. These are the hoped for results of an investment in our business district.

The State of Illinois' Tax Increment Financing District statute is an economic development tool that any municipality may qualify for if it meets certain conditions. Kenilworth conducted an eligibility analysis and the board determined that our business district met the required criteria. I hope opponents to a TIF in Kenilworth are not suggesting that Village Trustees should disregard an instrument for which our district qualifies and that would benefit our community because of a misplaced fear for its reputation. I have said multiple times that I recognize that change is difficult and uncertainty can be frightening. Development, when it comes, however, will be subject to a rigorous and thorough vetting process with multiple opportunities for public notification, comment and engagement. I would urge residents who would like more information to visit Kenilworth's web site www.vok.org and click on the link for details about the TIF District.

President, Village of Kenilworth
